'Tegenwoordig kennen mensen van alles de prijs, maar van niets de waarde.' Met deze beroemde woorden van Oscar Wilde opent Raj Patel zijn boek, waarin hij aantoont dat het een misvatting is om de prijzen van artikelen te beschouwen als een manier om de wereld te waarderen. De kosten van hamburgers bijvoorbeeld zijn veel hoger – denk aan overgewicht en hartkwalen – dan hun prijs in fastfoodketens doet vermoeden. We krijgen gsm's haast gratis bij een abonnement, maar vergeten dat het noodzakelijke erts (coltan) gedolven wordt in de mijnen van Congo door vrouwen die in slechte omstandigheden en met het risico op mishandeling en verkrachting nog geen 140 euro per jaar verdienen. Aan de hand van deze en andere voorbeelden vraagt Patel zich af op welke andere manier we de waarde van de wereld kunnen uitdrukken en hoe we de balans in de maatschappij kunnen hervinden. Hij focust daarbij op de rol van de politiek in de mondiale economische crisis in combinatie met de klimaat- en voedselcrisis.
